2. One can improve his/ her academic skills: Foundation courses allow you to develop the skills you will need to succeed in tertiary education. This ranges from general study skills (such as academic writing, time management and independent research) to knowledge in specific areas related to your chosen field. You can complete a math's bridging course before entering an engineering degree, for example.

3. One can take an alternative route into your course: If your intended field of study is very competitive or requires high marks, you may be worried about meeting the entry requirements. It could also be that a course prerequisite is not available at your school. Foundation programs and bridging courses are the ideal solution, as they not only allow you to gain the academic skills required to progress into your course — they're also a great pathway option. Students who complete a foundation course are generally better placed to enter tertiary study and often do so with credit.

4. One can choose a stream that suits your interests and background: Many foundation courses are streamed according to field of study, allowing students to get started on their studies in their area of interest — whether it's arts, education, engineering, psychology or science. Some are also streamed to accommodate for students with different educational backgrounds.
